

“You’re not the only one living here, ya know?”

It’s What’s On the Inside that Matters Most!

The quality of air in your home is important—for you, your family and your pets. Unfortunately, most of us take it for granted. The list of allergens, toxins and carcinogens that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) says are embedded in the walls, floors and furniture of the indoor atmosphere may astonish you. The EPA notes that your indoor air quality could 10 to 25 times higher than the outdoor air!

The Air You & Your Pet Breathe

According to a survey by the American Lung Association, people in the US spend an average of 65% of their time AT HOME. In that same survey, 90% of Americans were not aware that poor indoor air quality could result in air born illnesses, allergic reactions, and long-term lung and breathing problems.

But what about your pet?

Our pets stay home all day while we are at work. Most indoor pets spend less than 10% of their entire lives outside. Indoor exposure to such pollutants pose a significant health risk for them if the air quality within your home is not clean and well maintained!

What About You?

Pets are a significant source of allergens and asthma triggers due to the dander flakes their pets shed. These flakes, and pet hair, are part of what gets caught by your air filter and because they are larger than other particles. Therefore, your home’s air filter will require more frequent change to avoid it becoming clogged and ineffective. Otherwise, all of the pollutants will continue to re-circulate in your home’s air—the same air that you breathe!
